"Turn back, turn back from your evil ways." Ezekiel 33.11

*

The words rise in me like a distant call,
Not harsh, not condemning, but familiar,
A cry from the deepest part of myself,
Reminding me how easily I drift.

And so I notice the patterns and triggers,
Of past trauma, past attachments,
Still not gone, however far I travel.

How quietly the shadows gather,
How subtly my heart bends to the lesser.

And yet, in the midst of this,

Something in me stirs,

A willingness to turn,

Even if the turning is oh so slow.

I look into the darkness,

Not without fear,

Not to cling to it, not to judge it,

But simply to acknowledge:

Yes, this too is part of me.

And in this very act of noticing,
The grip loosens and the turning begins.

This is not dramatic.

It is the smallest shift,

A leaning toward life,

A softening toward God,

A small step into honesty,

Which is always the beginning of light.
